CURRICULUM:

- A visual presentation on the ways sexual predators can take information young people commonly post about themselves on social networking websites, and cross-index what they learn with other easily accessible information such as schedules of youth sports or other activities. Such "research" has enabled predators to literally track and attempt to groom potential victims.
- Safety tips for parents, including ways to protect children's privacy on the Internet; creation of a Child Identification Kit to document children's privacy and identifying information; a nine-point plan parents should take if a child goes missing, to ensure they contact the relevant agencies to help locate their child.
- Warning signs that a child may have been sexually abused by a relative or stranger.
- Warning signs that a computer may have been used to transmit or download encrypted material such as child pornography.
- Visual demonstration of SPB sex offender supervision technologies, including polygraph testing equipment and GPS equipment
- Case studies of family/stranger child abductions
